Locofuria Comics Free 157 Torrent Download -> DOWNLOAD Â .Q: Force the user to login to website before using API First time asking a question here. I'm currently trying to make a website using ASP.NET Core. I want to use the Microsoft.AspNetCore.Identity package and I want to make sure that the user should log in before they can use the API. I know that I can make an IPrincipal myself and check this on every request but I want to do it the "correct" way. I have looked into OAuth at least once, but I dont have much experience with this. Ideally, my website would only show certain data to the user if they are logged in. Can someone help me with that? Thank you A: If you're just looking for the easiest way possible to integrate authentication into an existing API you might want to look at ASP.NET Core IdentityServer4, specifically the OIDC or OpenIDConnect middleware for that. You can include this as a shared dependency into your API projects, and then just set the OAuth2AuthorizationOptions on your controllers to use the identity server's clients. This approach will handle a lot of the headaches that come with integrating with Microsoft identity platforms, and with usage of the "implicit grant" flow it can also be quite secure. (See for a longer discussion of this) As for the decision to be more integrated with ASP.NET Core Identity, I believe it's a trade off between how much work you have to do to add authentication into your application, versus the flexibility you have to host your applications and identity. There's a good article on the subject, but to summarize, the controllers already require a Startup object (which might be null if it's an ASP.NET Core web project), and adding the identity features is just a matter of adding a services.AddIdentity() call to the Startup.Configure() method. This will work with the default controller factory, and with the MVC and Web API controllers. You can host the identity server in a separate application, and add in a reference to a local identity server in your application and use the default controller factory, but you then have a lot more flexibility in the creation of a registered api controllers in a different assembly, etc 648931e174 but the most common is that you're not in the current directory of the target you're running in. This is likely to happen if you're trying to build in another project and are not in the directory of that project. A: I recently had this problem. It was due to one project being in a different directory than another (same project, same solution, same config, same builds, same build agents). In my case, the other project was a Sql Data Source. I had my SqlDataSource.csproj file in the folder for that project, but I had created my actual.csproj file elsewhere, since it includes more meta information. My build agents were looking for the file that the SqlDataSource.csproj is located in, but the real one was in
